The fruits of the planning and fundraising process are finally about to be harvested. In September 2007, when the Pacific Standard Time (PST) project was announced, it was an extraordinary vision for what could happen if the region’s arts institutions came together to present a year-long series of exhibitions and events focusing on Latin American art. Since then, PST has grown into a program that includes more than 100 institutions and has been extended to include the entire Western United States and Canada.

The fruits of the planning and fundraising process are finally about to be harvested. In September 2007, when the Pacific Standard Time (PST) project was announced, it was an extraordinary vision for what could happen if the region’s arts institutions came together to present a year-long series of exhibitions and events focusing on Latin American art. Since then, PST has grown into a program that includes more than 100 institutions and has been extended to include the entire Western United States and Canada.

The fruits of the planning and fundraising process are finally about to be harvested. In September 2007, when the Pacific Standard Time (PST) project was announced, it was an extraordinary vision for what could happen if the region’s arts institutions came together to present a year-long series of exhibitions and events focusing on Latin American art. Since then, PST has grown into a program that includes more than 100 institutions and has been extended to include the entire Western United States and Canada.

The fruits of the planning and fundraising process are finally about to be harvested. In September 2007, when the Pacific Standard Time (PST) project was announced, it was an extraordinary vision for what could happen if the region’s arts institutions came together to present a year-long series of exhibitions and events focusing on Latin American art. Since then, PST has grown into a program that includes more than 100 institutions and has been extended to include the entire Western United States and Canada.

The fruits of the planning and fundraising process are finally about to be harvested. In September 2007, when the Pacific Standard Time (PST) project was announced, it was an extraordinary vision for what could happen if the region’s arts institutions came together to present a year-long series of exhibitions and events focusing on Latin American art. Since then, PST has grown into a program that includes more than 100 institutions and has been extended to include the entire Western United States and Canada.

The fruits of the planning and fundraising process are finally about to be harvested. In September 2007, when the Pacific Standard Time (PST) project was announced, it was an extraordinary vision for what could happen if the region’s arts institutions came together to present a year-long series of exhibitions and events focusing on Latin American art. Since then, PST has grown into a program that includes more than 100 institutions and has been extended to include the entire Western United States and Canada.